EXCERPTS FROM ARTICLE PUBLISHED NOVEMBER 2, 2015

Sitting in his Rutland office, Casella's Chairman and CEO, John Casella, says Pappas is not out for the good of the company. "He's an activist investor that attacks four or five companies a year and that's his business model. And that business model looks at how they can sell the companies and create a short term game."

Because of that, Casella says he's spent the last month visiting the company's largest shareholders urging them to re-elect the company's slate of candidates: which includes himself, James O'Conner and William Hulligan.

O'Connor and Hulligan were recently named to the board and have more than 80 years of experience running multi-billion dollar solid waste companies. Far more experience, says Casella, than J.C.P.'s candidates.

Casella admits his company has taken risks over the years, some which didn't work. But he says a major reorganization in 2011 and a solid plan for growth has helped their stock price jump more than 40% this year alone.

"The performance speaks for itself; the stock price speaks for [itself]," says Casella. "And James doesn't want to talk about the last two years, he wants to talk about ten years ago. Well, what's relevant today is where we are as a company today."

Casella says he's especially incensed by allegations Pappas has made of unethical business transactions between Casella Waste and Casella Construction, a company led by John's brother Doug Casella.

"My perspective is that James is being very misleading and absolutely distorting the truth when he says that I transferred $80 million to construction," says Casella shaking his head.

Casella says his company has spent hundreds of millions of dollars over the years on waste-related construction projects.

He says any projects that his brother's construction company bids on are decided by an independent third party engineering firm to avoid any preferential treatment.

"And over the last three years, Casella Construction has only gotten 33 percent of the work. We use seven other contractors to do that construction work."
